Carter's loss was the result of a number of factors, including the Iran hostage crisis, the recession, and his perceived weakness on foreign policy. But it was also a reflection of a changing political landscape in which the American people were increasingly turning away from the liberalism of the 1960s and 1970s.

In the aftermath of his defeat, Carter could have retreated into retirement. But instead, he chose to embark on a new chapter in his life, one that would ultimately transform the post-presidency.

Carter's post-presidential work has focused on three main areas: human rights, peacemaking, and Habitat for Humanity.

Through his work with the Carter Center, which he founded in 1982, Carter has been a tireless advocate for human rights around the world. He has worked to promote democracy, human rights, and peace in countries such as Liberia, Haiti, and North Korea.

Carter has also been a leading voice for peace in the Middle East. He has met with leaders from both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and has worked to promote a two-state solution.

In addition to his work on human rights and peacemaking, Carter has also been a dedicated volunteer for Habitat for Humanity. He has helped to build homes for low-income families in the United States and around the world.

Carter's post-presidential work has earned him widespread praise. In 2002, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his "untiring effort to find peaceful solutions to international conflicts, to advance democracy and human rights, and to promote economic and social development."

Carter's transformation from defeated presidential candidate to global humanitarian is a remarkable story. He has shown that it is possible to lose an election and still make a lasting difference in the world.
